In order to appreciate the little things, you must first stop to see them around you. This has been a common notion in society for some time now but with the current state of our societal values, it is something that gets pushed to the wayside more often than not. This is why I decided to do a series of photographs to emphasize the importance of the beauty that surrounds us; beauty that can be found in anything, if you look for it. The macro images are meant to highlight the subject as much as possible and show objects in a new light. I want the effect of the images to make the viewer take a closer look at the everyday world that surrounds us.
